This talk will describe the methods we use, most of which involves double-resonance laser spectroscopy, to record conformation-specific spectra of molecules, radicals, high-energy intermediates, and ions in the gas phase. Examples will be given relevant to applications ranging from studies of the conformational preferences of synthetic foldamers, protonated peptides, combustion intermediates, and photochemical products of relevance in Titan’s atmosphere.